A: MRC is a non-profit organization that develops and oversees state-wide mattress recycling programs that enact the Mattress Recycling Act. A: Approximately 15 to 20 million mattresses and box springs are disposed of every year in the United States. Not only do these items take up landfill space, but materials such as springs are difficult to compact and can be easily attached to equipment. As a result, many communities separate mattresses from other solid waste, increasing management costs. More than 80% of mattress and box springs can be recycled into other useful products. Learn more about recycling mattresses Mattress Recycling Council Recycling: Convert steel springs, latex foam and other materials into new products to save resources A: In some states, including Connecticut, Rhode Island, and California, retailers must collect fees from the sale of each mattress and each box spring to reduce the number of illegally dumped mattresses and reduce incinerators and landfills. This fee will fund the state's recycling program. Learn more from bye-bye mattresses A: Yes. In states with mattress recycling laws, retailers are required to collect this fee on all mattresses and box spring sales in order to fund the state mattress recycling program.
